SPASMOPHILIA

Spasmophilia is a syndrome characterized by malaise, irritability and mild to severe "latent tetany," a chronic condition of generalized hypertonicity of tendons and muscles. It is considered to be caused by several factors including chronic stress, impaired calcium metabolism due to insufficient vitamin D and chronic magnesium deficiency. The importance of magnesium has been underemphasized in favor of calcium, but lack of magnesium can have a significant impact throughout the body's physiology. Magnesium deficiency has been cited as a critical factor in PMS, painful menses, mitral valve prolapse, formation of embolisms and possibly even morbidity from cancer. Its role in the nervous, skeletomuscular and endocrine systems is essential. It is the hardness factor in bones and teeth and the flexibility factor in muscles. It promotes bile production by the liver and helps to regulate motility of the intestinal tract and has thermoregulatory, anti-stress, antiallergic and anti-inflammatory properties.

A hyperexcretion of magnesium in the urine can occur as the result of some kidney disorders, diuretics or medication with lithium. Deficiency can occur also as the result of poor intestinal absorption, abuse of laxatives or alcoholism.

Spasmophilia is usually treated by means of magnesium supplementation as well as magnesium utilization factors: vitamins D3, B6, etc. Beta-blockers are also sometimes used for treatment in addition to nutritional or botanical treatment.

FOODS RICH IN MAGNESIUM: Nuts — cashews, almonds, Brazil nuts, peanuts, pecans, hazelnuts, walnuts. Vegetables — broad beans, soy flour, peas, beets grains: bran (especially oat bran), whole barley, whole rye, whole wheat, whole oats, corn, brown rice.
